The Layer palette provides several types of Layers for this purpose: * Regular Layers : These Layers are the standard type of Layers (see Chapter 8) used in most cases when creating your graphics. * New Layers : These Layers are usually used only when you're drawing or creating layers and other objects for your images. * Smart Objects : Smart Objects (covered in Chapter 14) are usually used in graphics and illustrations to store and format the data of another object. The data is used from a Smart Object, not the image itself. In some cases, the data in a Smart Object is used to create new layers and combine objects in an image. * Custom Layers : These Layers are used only when you want to apply special effects to your layers. They work with the Filters, Blend Modes, and other effects (covered in Chapter 15) found in Photoshop. You also can find some handy tools to create your own Layers on the Custom Layer panel. * Background : These Layers are usually used only when working with a transparent or gray-scale image. Figure 2-5 shows the Layers palette in Photoshop. In this chapter, you'll learn how to work with regular Layers, as well as work with Smart Objects and Custom Layers. You'll learn how to use each type of Layer in this section, and then how to work with layers in general in Chapter 8. ## Working with Layers In this section, you'll learn how to create, edit, and rearrange objects on a layer.

The first version of Photoshop Elements was released in 1995 and remains one of the most popular and powerful graphic design tools for creating images. What's New In?

The present invention relates generally to recovery of collateral through sale of an exhaustible asset and, more particularly, to recovery of collateral through sale of an exhaustible asset by combining an asset payment and a collateral transfer. In the realm of the financial services industry, services have been developed that address several areas of economic hardship. One example is the provision of insurance against unanticipated events, such as a natural disaster, which could cause property damage. Providing such insurance can be costly, but an individual purchaser is often not in a position to pay the entire amount of the insurance in one fell swoop. Instead, the purchaser often initially purchases a limited amount of insurance coverage. Should this initial coverage prove insufficient, the purchaser can acquire additional coverage by buying additional insurance. For a reasonable amount of money, the purchaser thus can purchase extended insurance coverage that adequately addresses any unanticipated events. Unanticipated events will likely be correlated to the purchaser""s geographic region. For example, it is likely that a purchaser in the northern United States would be at risk for unanticipated events that affect the northern United States, such as a lake-related unanticipated event or a tornado, while a purchaser in the southern United States would be at risk for unanticipated events that affect the southern United States, such as a hurricane. In a similar fashion, a purchaser in the northeastern United States might be at risk for unanticipated events that affect the northeastern United States, while a purchaser in the southwestern United States might be at risk for unanticipated events that affect the southwestern United States. Consequently, a purchaser must purchase insurance coverage for multiple states or multiple areas in the same state. Unfortunately, purchasing insurance coverage for multiple areas for the same purchaser is inefficient. The purchaser is charged on a geographic basis for the insurance coverage and cannot utilize a credit-based pricing structure. Thus, the purchaser must select among the different available policies, and the costs for the policies are unknown and changeable. The purchaser may purchase multiple policies or a single policy with larger geographic coverage.

However, these options are also less than ideal since multiple policies will increase administrative costs, and larger policies will increase costs to the purchaser. Accordingly, there is a need for a method of providing insurance coverage for a large number of geographic areas to a single purchaser that is efficient, relatively cost effective, and credits the purchaser for the cost of the insurance coverage. While this invention is susceptible to various modifications and alternative forms, specific embodiments thereof have been shown by way of example in the drawings and are herein described in detail
